Section A

Answer Question 1.

- 1 Content analysis is often used by sociologists to study the media. It is a method that is mostly used to collect quantitative data by counting how many times a word, theme or image occurs in a magazine, television programme or website. The Glasgow Media Group used content analysis to explore the language used in news reporting to see whether it contained political bias.

Interpretivists are critical of content analysis; they argue that the quantitative data collected using this method is low in validity. Interpretivists prefer methods that collect qualitative data, such as unstructured interviews and participant observation. However, positivists are critical of these qualitative approaches, which they see as unscientific.

- (a) What is meant by the term validity? [2]
- (b) Describe two strengths of using content analysis. [4]
- (c) Explain why interpretivists criticise the use of quantitative data in sociological research. [8]
- (d) Assess the limitations of using qualitative data in sociological research. [11]

Section B

Answer either Question 2 or Question 3.

- 2 Explain and assess the view that human behaviour is determined by structural forces. [25]
- 3 Explain and assess the post-modernist view that class divisions have little influence in shaping social identities today. [25]
